

Visit to the Toddler Room

October 13, 2011

Today Mandy took Henry and James to the toddler room. It was the teacher's intention to observe the babies when they join the room where the toddlers are working with light and shadow.

Henry came into the window room and looked out the window almost immediately. He noticed the cars passing by, looked over at me, and "talked" (Lately Henry has been practicing his communication skills by "babbling with intent"). It seems like Henry needed a better view because he climbed onto the baby bed and continued to look out the window for over ten minutes. In the meantime while James was exploring the different materials in the room he also noticed the cars rolling by on Moreland. Lately James has been doing a lot of pointing. Sometimes it is done with intention and other times he seems to be pointing at nothing in particular. Today though, he was clearly pointing at either the window or the cars.

